ABSTRACT

The act of violence has become an interesting and widely researched topic. Whether an act is a violence or not mostly depends on a social structure and value judgement of the society. There are different type of violence such as physical violence, emotional violence and economic violence. In this paper, we will overview the indirect and abstract violence, whose physical and mental effects may not be estimated on people behaviours like inflation, economic violence, media terrorism and unemployment. An increase in tendency to crime with violence in a society may occur some socio-economic changes. Depending on the economic turbulence, it is observed that the more a country lived the economic crises, the more increase in violence, deterioration in human relations and fluctuation in labor force market. Economic inequality after crises not only related to poverty, but also unemployment, insufficient education and social control etc. In some research, it is pointed out that poverty and economic inequality may not be directly linked with violence. However, the poverty reasons of these factors causes violent crimes are indicated. In this paper, the growth of Turkey, its labor force participation rate, unemployment and crime will be examined with the forensic statistical help and their outcome will be evaluated.
